However, the Army has reported that future reset costs will depend on the amount of forces committed overseas and the amount of equipment destroyed or damaged. The Army has also stated it will need reset funds for at least two to three years after operations cease. Finally, the Army has estimated that it will need 10 billion to 12 billion to replace prepositioned equipment that it used to support operations and accelerate the creation of additional brigades. However, it is not clear whether these costs have been reflected in DODs funding request to date, and this amount could be modified. Turning to management issues, we have identified a need for the Army to develop a more integrated plan for equipping that promotes greater transparency in its cost estimates and ensures that funding requests are based on sound plans with measurable goals, realistic time frames, prioritized resource needs, and performance measures to gauge progress. The Army currently lacks aspects of such an overall...
