The second, The Medicine Man, now in Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, represents the red man's suspicion of the white invader. The third, Protest, shown at the St. Louis Exposition, represents the warfare of tribesman against settler. The fourth, The Appeal to the Great Spirit, represents surrender, not to human enemies, but a higher friend. An Indian horseman drops the rope halter that guides his mount, lifts his face to the sky and spreads his arms in a movement of invocation. The racial tragedy in which our national life began is completely rendered by the four. The work may be said to have had its source in the boyhood of the artist. By a happy chance there was a sculptor born in Utah, a long day's ride from the Great Salt Lake, at a time when the houses were log cabins and the village was protected against Indian attacks by an adobe wall. Indian braves were familiar sights of his boyhood, and he early learned how it felt to ride an Indian pony. Living among them, their point of view mingled in his mind with that of his own people and became an ineffaceable impression. These early memories have now borne fruit in a permanent imaginative record of an ethnic type since merging in our own and of an environment which since has passed away. The groups commemorate at once the vigor, grace and dignity of the Indian warrior, the...
